Boy-Tales of a Childhood by Roald Dahl

We hope you enjoyed week 4 of reading and writing about our Anew class novel. We really enjoyed reading your eye witness $\frac{\kappa}{2}$ accounts of the incident in the sweet shop.

★This week's reading focus is looking at comprehension $\frac{1}{2}$ guestions linked to this text and also looking at exploring vocabulary.

★The writing will focus on writing in the style of Roald Dahl. This is very similar ★to how we produce pieces of writing in school.

Remember, if your child prefers, you can collect a book from school.

 $\frac{\pi}{2}$ Alternatively, you can use the link to the online version PDF found here Boy-Tales of a Childhood PDF

World Book Day is on the 4th March this year and we have put some excellent activities on the home overview this week to celebrate this day, however there are many exciting live streams going on throughout the week including from 'Captain Hardcastle', pp. 129-131

We called them masters in those days, not teachers, and at St Peter's the one I feared most of all, apart from the Headmaster, was Captain Hardcastle.

This man was slim and wiry and he played football. On the football field he wore white running shorts and white gymshoes and short white socks. His legs were as hard and thin as ram's legs and the skin around his calves was almost exactly the colour of mutton fat. The hair on his head was not ginger. It was brilliant dark vermilion, like a ripe orange, and it was plastered back with immense quantities of brilliantine in the same fashion as the Headmaster's. The parting in his hair was a white line straight down the middle of the scalp, so straight it could only have been made with a ruler. On either side of the parting you could see the comb tracks running back through the greasy orange hair like little tram-lines.

Captain Hardcastle sported a moustache that was the same colour as his hair, and oh what a moustache it was! A truly terrifying sight, a thick orange hedge that sprouted and flourished between his nose and his upper lip and ran clear across his face from the middle of one cheek to the middle of the other. But this was not one of those nailbrush moustaches, all short and clipped and bristly. Nor was it long and droopy in the walrus style. Instead, it was curled most splendidly upwards all the way along as though it had a permanent wave put into it or possibly curling tongs heated in the mornings over a tiny flame of methylated spirits. The only other way he could have achieved this curling effect, we boys decided, was by prolonged upward brushing with a hard toothbrush in front of the looking-glass every morning.

Behind the moustache there lived an inflamed and savage face with a deeply corrugated brow that indicated a very limited intelligence. 'Life is a puzzlement,' the corrugated brow seemed to be saying, 'and the world is a dangerous place. All men are enemies and small boys are insects that will turn and bite you if you don't get them first and squash them hard.'

Captain Hardcastle was never still. His orange head twitched and jerked perpetually from side to side in the most alarming fashion, and each twitch was accompanied by a little grunt that came out of his nostrils. He had been a soldier in the Great War and that, of course, was how he received his title. But even small insects like us knew that 'Captain' was not a very exalted rank and only a man with little else to boast about would hang on to it in civilian life. It was bad enough to keep calling yourself 'Major' after it was all over, but 'Captain' was the bottoms.
